What's Written Down About Your Wife's Day, Who Knows the Rest, and Who Has a Copy

A one-page record of where each piece of her day lives, on paper or in someone's head, and who on the new team has been given what.

Her mornings are in your head. Her evenings are in your daughter's. The dietary instructions from the doctor's office are in a folder somewhere in the kitchen.

This page doesn't ask you to write any of it out. It asks where each piece lives, how recent it is, and who on the new team has been handed a copy.

ABOUT HER DAY	ON PAPER? WHERE	WHO KNOWS IT BEST	DATE WRITTEN
The name she likes to be called
Her own account of a good day
Her morning routine
Her evening routine
What she likes to eat and drink, and her usual meal times
Allergies and dietary instructions a clinician gave you in writing
The activities she enjoys
The people who matter to her, and how to reach them
How she likes to be spoken to
What helps her settle somewhere unfamiliar

Who has been given a copy

One row for each person on the new team who has the page about her.

WHAT WAS HANDED OVER	GIVEN TO (NAME AND ROLE)	DATE	TOLD US THEY RECEIVED IT
The short page about her

WHAT WAS HANDED OVER	GIVEN TO (NAME AND ROLE)	DATE	TOLD US THEY RECEIVED IT

What's still only in someone's head, and who will write it down

Anything above with nothing in the second column. Put a name next to each.

FOR EXAMPLE Her evenings. Our daughter knows them better than I do. She'll write them out on Thursday.

How to use it

- Don't copy her routines onto this page. Just say where each one is written, or who carries it.
- Next to anything written down, note the date and whose words they are: hers, yours or someone else's.
- For the allergy and dietary papers, note who gave them and the date printed on them. Don't restate them in your own words.
- Bring this page along with the short page about her on the first day.

What this page doesn't do

It doesn't explain what any written instruction means or say which of her preferences matters most. If something in the instructions is unclear, that's a question for the clinician who wrote it.

Ready for the next step?

You know what's on paper, what's still in someone's head and who has a copy. The care interview uses what you've located: it walks you through her situation area by area, keeps what you tell it about her with its source and date, and turns your answers into a Family Care Profile you can bring to any care conversation.
